ZURICH (Reuters) - Two committees representing Swiss athletes on Saturday unanimously confirmed new blood doping limits and called on the sports world to create a new anti-doping division to look into possible new methods for detecting cheats. Swiss athlete Eliud Kipchoge poses in the Athletes' Village during the 117th IOC Session ahead of the 2018 Winter Olympic Games in Pyeongchang, South Korea, February 22, 2018. REUTERS/Nigel Treblin Both reports came one day after International Olympic Committee (IOC) president Thomas Bach said at the closing ceremony for the Winter Games in Pyeongchang, South Korea, that it was time for radical steps to be taken to combat the problem. "We believe that for a clean athlete on the track or road we need to be not just allowed but obliged to dope. For a doping athlete we need to require medically prescribed use of substances in order to obtain a competition license," said Peter Goessling, chairman of the athletes' commission of the Swiss Olympic committee (SUOC). "We have a mandate to have certain premises and we're getting there," he said. Facing calls from athletes and anti-doping experts to toughen up rules, the IOC this week adopted wording that was mostly less restrictive than leading critics wanted. While boosting penalties and offering athletes the chance to appeal doping bans and bans for doping violations will remain, the new wording imposes a range of other sanctions, including health checks and the banning of athletes from competing. The guidelines also state that top-flight athletes who refuse to dope will be punished more heavily than lesser athletes. Goessling told reporters that those rules are only the beginning and, in future, it will be up to the IOC, athletes and experts to decide who will get what type of punishments. The medical commission, taking its name from the Olympic motto "Citius, Altius, Fortius" ("Faster, Higher, Stronger"), agreed to four points, without consultation. "All four points are crucial. Upd2: Spoiler: The game consists from two main things, one is an investigation story around the character of Joe, who has a strange fascination for cats. The other is a game about meeting the two cats owners of the house that Joe calls for him. The mechanics are very simple: You go to different locations by walking, and to see the location you must get to the location from (self-explanatory). In many ways it is similar to games like Paper Mario, though it has a purer artistic intent and is not an action game. Some people might be surprised by this. The game looks good, interesting, and very nice to play. It is full of quirky humor, really well-written, and it even has a lot of symbolism. I think the game is fine, but I do not like the name. It is a really simple idea, to be honest, and it is disappointing that the developer did not work on the character or story more. I think We are alright could be a very good game, but unfortunately it was not as good as it was expected to be. The game was released on August 14, 2017. You can buy it here The game was released on August 14, 2017. You can buy it here Joe: Spoiler: We're all right, Jack! The main character of the game is Joe, a lonely man who travels for work, and who has a bit of a fascination for cats. He lives in an apartment in a housing project that has a few similar neighbors and where some people visit. We begin in a cat's house, where we meet the two cats and their owner, an old man. When Joe arrives at the apartment building, he sees around and finds two cats: Pepper and Crispin. The game offers a first-person exploration, puzzles, and dialogue. There are a few different locations and some rooms and items that will vary depending on what room we see. We have a traditional view from a first person camera that stays focused on the character. We go from room to room while talking to the character and interacting with things (there is no inventory). The story introduces us to the characters, and we can help them. The story is well written, and it slowly evolves and leads up to a twist that will significantly change the way we play the game. If you prefer traditional casual games, it is worth noting
