The Islamic State Khomein (ISIS or IS) cybercrime unit now has some 85,000 user accounts on Twitter, it has been revealed. The unit – which continues to rapidly grow – has appeared to be many Twitter followers ahead of the company's banning of thousands of accounts it believed to have been central in ISIS propaganda following its use of the social media site as an outlet for its extremist views. On Sunday, Wired reported how the unit, which used to belong to a Syrian hacker named "Abu Abdo", would travel to manufacturing facilities and hack them in order to create vehicles that could spread its disinformation online. The equipment the unit favoured would include "university student desktops, old Chrome browsers and the like," the magazine cited another "detected" individual as saying. The Hacker News page of the hacking group's operator, who has remained anonymous, says that he "learned about writing scripts and making programs while watching a musical for children," and the site says that it has been in operation since April 2015. It states that it is part of the "cyber-jihad movement." In one spectacular demonstration of the world's evolving information warfare battlefield, the New York Magazine's website warned in August of a Twitter user who was trying to hijack accounts using Ponzi schemes, a "booze driving" app, and an account that was itself created by a Ponzi scheme. The hacker claimed the Twitter accounts were his own and they had been sent to the company with malicious software in order to tip off Twitter to their existence. Though the article states that the accounts had been first started by Ponzi schemes, the hacker was actually "responsible for devising the app that was sending out the tweets," it said. Twitter revealed in May of the 4,791 suspended accounts it believed to have been part of the abuse, many of which were on claim to be solely tweeting in favour of ISIS, while
